CONGRESS HAS ADJOURNED.

THE SPECIAL SESSION ENDED.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE LAST DAY IN BOTH BRANCHES.

THE HOUSE GETS INTO A DEADLOCK OVER THE QUESTION OF PAYING EMPLOYEES DURING THE RECESS AND MR. HUTCHESON LEADS A FILLUSTERING MOVEMENT, WHICH IS STOPPED BY THE FINAL FALL OF THE SPEAKER'S GAVEL—THE SENATE SESSION ENDS QUIETLY.

Washington, Nov. 3.—In the House of Representatives the last day of the "extraordinary session" was marked by some extraordinary proceedings and an unusual amount of confusion, but it was barren of results.

EMPLOYEES TO SUFFER FROM "HOLMANISM."

In the debate on this proposition last night Mr. Washington, of Tennessee, a Democrat, said that he had been informed at the Treasury Department that "the funds for paying the engineers, firemen and others, whose services are absolutely necessary to keep the public buildings in a habitable condition during the winter weather, have been exhausted, and their services have been dispensed with in many of the public buildings on account of the lack of funds."

He continued, "and also with a number of public buildings, which are elsewhere, and unless the Urgent Deficiency bill becomes a law there will be suffering among the clerks and officials generally on this account." But the House of Representatives, in its devotion to principle, paid no heed to this appeal.

"Not a dime will we grant until the Senate abandons this attempt to filch money from the National purse to pay the private clerks of Senators for services they did not perform," was the ultimatum of the Democratic patriots who control the House of Representatives.

This was the high and safe ground, and it was a pity that the Democrats had to abandon it. They had already passed an adjournment resolution, thereby laying the groundwork for a claim for mileage at the regular session, and with that a few of them thought they ought to be content. Not so the majority, however, which fought and struggled until the expiration of a resolution to do for their private clerks with Roman fortitude and virtue when the Senate tried to do it for its clerks.

ITS SPIRIT OF VIRTUE SHORT-LIVED.

Mr. Richardson, of Tennessee, was the eminent Democrat who led this gallant but temporarily unsuccessful raid against the National Treasury. He offered a resolution appropriating $200,000 not exceeding $40,000 for the payment of House employees and clerks to members from this date until the beginning of the regular session.

Chairman Sayers, of the Appropriations Committee, opposed the resolution and reminded the House that it had just succeeded in defeating a like proposition in behalf of the clerks of Senators. Mr. Kilgore, of Texas, made the same point and remarked that when the resolution authorizing clerks for members was considered and passed by the last Congress the main argument in favor of it was that the services of these clerks were absolutely necessary "to send out the public documents and other plunder of members" during the sessions of Congress, and would not be necessary when the House was not in session.

The joint resolution was opposed by several other members, and Mr. Cannon, of Illinois, suggested that it be changed to a simple House resolution, which would not require the concurrence of the Senate or the approval of the President. Mr. Richardson was short-sighted, or else he was willing to give the Senate an opportunity to add the obnoxious item for the payment of its own clerks as an amendment, and he refused to accept Mr. Cannon's suggestion.

When the question was put, on the adoption of the resolution, it was apparent that the House had completely recovered from the spasm of virtue which had affected it when it refused to allow money for Senators' clerks, for there was a deafening roar of yeas, against a faint and scattering chorus in the negative.

A TEXAS PATRIOT'S UNAVAILING STRUGGLE.

But one noble patriot—a Texan, named Hutcheson—was not to be overruled by any odds, however great, and he began to filibuster, only a handful of members to back him. It was useless, and after a brief but glorious struggle he and his followers were overcome, and the resolution was sent to the Senate, which soon returned it, after adding an amendment providing for the payment of its own clerks.

This amendment was read, and Mr. Richardson moved that the Senate should not be troubled with it. The amendment was rejected, and the House adjourned.

"I desire to say that I have been informed by the chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, Senator Cockrell, not once or twice, but several times, that the appropriation for any purpose will pass the Senate until the House shall consent to appropriate the money for the payment of Senators' clerks during the vacation of the List Congress, and he has authorized me to make that statement to this House."

"Does the gentleman from Texas know what half of that item?" blandly asked Mr. Reed. "I cannot say anything about that," replied Governor Sayers, with an air which indicated that he ought to have used the words "will not instead of 'cannot.'" "It is no secret to him or to other members of the House Committee
